Well, after reading some of Guru's past posts, I regret to say I won't be able to duplicate his slightly whiney tone for this one. Why? Because in this scribe's humble opinion, this past week's run at "Dream Lake" in Shi Zhe was everything a hash run is supposed to be. It had it all: great weather, forest, bamboo thickets, commanding ridge-top views, river tracing, and oh ya...shitloads of cold beer at the end! The trail, ably laid out by AtomiCock and co-hare Twinass, took us up, up, up a long forested upslope in the early stages, then veered left along the ridge through trees and over slabs of exposed rock. To the right, those willing to pause and take in the view could see the lush green valley below at a perfect time of day as it was bathed in late-afternoon sunlight. The weather couldn't have been better for hashing, though the footing was slippery from previous rain - especially on the long winding way down from the ridge. A river check at the bottom that had me cursing, then a roundabout trail back to the river for some welcome thrashing around in the cool water. Some relatively run-able terrain followed, then a stretch of up up up again that was tough but not cruel. Anyways, just as I was starting to curse the hares and their mothers, I stumbled out of the bush to find the On-In sign, so to me that means the length of the run was just right. As usual, that shitty Taiwan pee jyo tastes just great after almost 2 hours hashing through the bush. The bash was a small one but good food and even better, we didn't have to travel as the restaurant was at the start-finish site. On On!!
